for the strength of the readjusters is a true one. Further on in the leader is this: The democratic party of Virginia made a great mistake in yielding so far to the old federalists [whigs?] as to abandon its name, and take that of conservatives. In the reforming of the lines for battle this fall, let it reassume its time honored name, and let all who will not act with it, join Mahone," etc. That is, adopt Mahone's principles, at last, when triumphant, but continue the war on the man who did most to save the democratic principles from utter overthrow. The party shibboleth of the close corporation of old Virginia officeholders is, "Anything to beat Mahone!" TRUE DEMOCRAT. Mahone!" May 12, 1881.

On the same night a party of disguised men visited the house of a man named Clifford, who had been consured by the land league, at Killorglin, county Kerry, and having roused him out of bed cut off his ears and left him in a state of insensibility. In the course of the same day a vio lent affray took place at New Pallas between a crowd of some thousand villagers and a large body of police, and all the authority of the officers was needed to prevent the affair from ending in horrible bloodshed. A plantation of valuable wood is set on fire and consumed. A house is burned down, barely leaving time for the people in-side to escape with their lives. Threatening letters and stonings are too frequent to be worth enumerating.
